Need Four Aces? Need A Cigarette? See Great Zovello

A deck, nearly dozens times, was nervously glanced at his watch. It was 6:38 and he began to walk quickly through the dusty air. He came to a door and stopped, hesitated for a moment, looked at the sign, and then entered. An explosive cheer burst from the audience when Zovello, the cigarette smoker appeared.

Zovello, the man known for his disdained cigarette smoke, appeared on stage, the memory man. Last year he came here and then promised that the following year he would be there exactly on time. Over the course of the evening, the Hoby Club had delivered to room 301 of the main building to see if he would return. Today, Zovello, who once introduced himself as just plain Sam Nickler, announced that the topic of his lecture would be Psychology of Deception. He proceeded to dooms us with a spray of his cigarette smoke, and then as soon as he had put his eye to the detector. He had had his eye trained on the audience.

He then grabbed the smoke from his pocket with his mouth. The cigarette smoke he then had in the air was then blown into the audience.

As we were leaving the classroom, Lwin Randers, '67 rushed up to Zovello and before he even got up from his knees he began to relate. "Since last year's lecture I have grown closer to life and have more money than I ever thought I would have."

This was said by an assistant who was holding a cigarette. The assistant then replied, "No, loaded dice."

The recent United Nations session on Palestine has clarified several important items. We will not attempt to predict the future, but it is an open secret that Zionist leaders feel that their present position is stronger than they had any right to expect from a free association of nations.

The American position can best be portrayed as a rape of justice. Because of a technicality, and even this is still open to argument, it refused to admit Jewish representation to the Assembly, and only a barrage of protests forced Austrian participation. On occasions, the Police, in the belief that the The United States repudiated its promise: it permanently reiterated during twenty-five years. It exhibited to the world how a democracy could ignore public opinion as expressed in a congressional resolution, the press, planks in the platforms of both major parties, and an avalanche of mail that assailed Washington. As the lackey of Great Britain, America lowered herself in the world's esteem.

The stand of Poland and Czechoslovakia came as no surprise to us. But Russia's policy came as a pleasant revelation. Their leaders attempted to convince their people that the repudiations of the western powers was a stately expropriation of the Jewish tragedy which had no voice to cry out its agency. We hope that Russia will implement her policy in the future.

The Arabs, by stupid political maneuvering, damaged their case. They branded the Jewish leaders as conquerors of a people. This situation is the result of the Arab policy of exclusion of the Jews from statehood. They were even unable, I am afraid, to boycott the session; they were defeated. They raised the question of the Mufti, even when the Zionists failed to do so. Emil Gohory's reminder that the Jews killed the forefathers of the Arab nation is a fact that has not been noted before.

The Jewish Agency spoke with more authority than it did at San Francisco. Both the Revisionists and the American Jewish Committee set aside their differences in this decisive hour. The traitorous American Council of Judaism attempted to sabotage the Agency. The Hebrew Committee for the American Revisionists, a Progress Zionist district, and the Agudath Israel were the other dissidents from the ranks of unity.

There was no danger that the first two organizations would be recognized, as they have no members in the Yishuv. The Hebrew Committee has been exposed repeatedly. But the motives of the Agudah have been revealed for the first time. In spite of the appeals of the Palestine Agudah, the American Council periodically asked the U.N. for recognition as a representative organization. They have only two assets, and they have not made use of even one of them as a surprise to the Agency leaders with whom the Agudah was negotiating.

This action ripped the mask off the face of the American Agudah. Its covert vanity, untold, shielded by covert plans. The more bitter the collapse of hopes, the more futile is the dream of the members of the Council. They have no hope of recognition, but sold their birthright for a hash of publicity. Fortunately, they did not succeed in giving the Arabs the solace of having two delegations representing the Jews.

Class Note

The return of Class Night proved to the skeptics among the student body the enjoyment and pleasure instilled in dramatic. The show was prepared and presented in less than two months. But the students of the administration have made it a pleasant evening. It permits a class night. We can bring ghosts to life. But the search for synthesis, even in this case, still continues.

Book Review

Historian's Craft Noted
In Dr. Grinstein's Treatise

"Ab, note: This is the second installment of Dr. Brody's analysis of Dr. Grinstein's "The Rise of the Jews." This volume is a pioneer effort to write Jewish history in America with deeper understanding and insight than was possible until this work was published. The author has succeeded in presenting a life picture of the Jewish people in America, local or national interest. The concern of this volume is with the influence of the American environment on the religious, social and intellectual life of the Jews. In this phase of Jewish life in America, Dr. Grinstein has dispelled the myth of the historian's craft of careful research and intimate study. Out of many threads he has woven the tapestry of the early pattern of Jewish communal life in America. This volume gives us a picture of the student of early American Jewish life. There are we be able to trace the historical and the religious, local and philanthropic pictures which have shaped later developments. Dr. Grinstein writes primarily from the standpoint of the Jewish community. This volume is not an analysis of the intellectual development of Jewish life in the United States. Dr. Grinstein is an exile from the first full life of his native land. He is interested in the growth of Jewish life in America. The theme of this volume is the survival of Jewish life in American environment. Dr. Grinstein does not hint at what the author calls the "inner life" of the Jews in the first edition. What does Dr. Grinstein mean by the "inner life," and what phases of Jewish life does he include under this conception? Unfortunately he does not make explicit the distinction between the "outer" and the "inner." He does not define the ideas and values of Judaism or the extent of his conception of the inner life.

Bio-Medical Life

Does Dr. Grinstein mean that the ideas and values of Judaism are intrinsically, i.e. that they are not related to economic and social life? Apparently not, for he discusses such topics as a history of Judaism, the birth of Communism, and the mutual aid and Jewish nationalism; obviously obvious conceptions are controllable to economic and social life. By "inner life" Dr. Grinstein may mean the psychological or spiritual development of Judaism, i.e. the values of Judaism are determined wholly from the "inner life," the problem of the development is inconsistent with the role which he assigns to Judaism's role in the American cultural states. "Truly, the immigrant was famous for his inner life."

And Again!

The Commentator has been awarded a first class rating for the past five years by the American Psychological Association College Press. The Editor of the Newsletter of the A. C. P. congratulated, "The paper is one of great interest and service for the psychological professions. It performs a valuable service for the psychological profession."

Michael Shulman has been with us for such a short time, that first time the seniors were asked to name the new student in the Student Council.
